CATAWBA EARLY FALL 1977

to Vera

Picked near the front porch in July, With magenta flowers,
green-golden,

The horsemint tea in the turquoise cup still savors of summer as the apple smell rises from the meadow lap.

Pink yarrow
before the fireplace looks rich with the creamy white in their silver pot - in back, the soft blacks in the fireplace.
The thick florets cast little exquisite shadows on the concrete hearth.

Outside,
hemlock glitters in light autumnal, sun still high, leaf cover thinning - now big patches of sun light the still glowing green of the grass under the two great oaks before the house.

Vera,

this is our autumn, our glory-prime of final fruiting, our time of great individuation, each tree a different color, each leaf, and on every leaf many colors.

In the wind sweep long slim trunks swing, each tree at its own tempo and Ah!
fingertip titillation of leaves.

In the frosty night already through windblown boughs of the two old oaks before the house you can see stars.

I'm clearing the land:
Think!
the axe
deep bites white heartwood; gracefully the tree, limbs outspread, falls back at the speed of a sigh.

The scythe tingles in the ragweed feeling the beautiful curves of earth with a knife - level with the ground hold the blade, tip up a bit - and with a slight hip twist - and as with a musical instrument freely and precisely swing!

I unchoke the grass freeing the apples, carving close to the edges, revealing the meadow - Ah! - surely, Vera! landscaping's the most satisfying art (Spencer Holst and Edgar Poe have said it).

With mad abandon the tree wind infallibly graceful performs ballet.
To watch the wind in the Bolick's pasture toss the hilltop acropoli of trees, first behind the twin maple then a heartbeat later the turmoil overwhelms our hill where I stand.

Free the line of the land, of Flattop Mountain, starting at hill crest above the ballfield, down glide, cross Citadel path in front of Main House (where are two old cherry trees) past cottage through woods down through Bolick's pasture till the mountain ends - or begins - by our Boone Road entrance at the old Ranch Motel.

Clear! Clean!
of cluttering:
ugly weed,
the rag, dull, colorless, uneven tops obscure.
the beautiful sweep of earth-forms the long graceful lines of this ancient mountain; its wiry texture betrays the wind with its stiff jig;
- and how unlike! - grass is grace! trembles confessionally on the earth breast - reveals as it covers, perfect earth fur.

Swami Muktananda says the world is Shakti, Chiti, Mother Kundalini, what Jews call Shekhinah, and Christians Holy Ghost, Spirit of God, of Truth, Creator, Comforter; in the beginning the Spirit of God moves on the face of the deep.

Red, ruby, rust, orange, flame, maples coral, pink, peach,
 Birches light yellow, oaks copper, gold, hydrangeas rose a-stipple on each other and the blue blue sky.

Muktananda says the enlightened may see the sport of Shakti vibrating forth in many forms, revelling on any dirty city street; but even the fool may find it here - the grass aroma sun sparkle on leaves leaf chatter and laughter; long smiling mountain lines, ecstatic moan of swaying trees, each a violin, the wind hugely bowing.

Yes, joyous Chiti curls herself giggling silently like a child hiding in a game, into the dazzling pure close white hearts of little sapling locust trees and sassafras where I grave my axe to preserve the grass.

I went down to the spring - white snakeroot's tiny snowballs and rank leafage of big dark green hearts by the path - all gone, leaves fill the path (the hill's north side is frosted soonest)
- and - late September glory!
- pink, rose, red, coral - different colored maple leaves' starry forms on the glossy semi-clear dark green water, rippling, speckled, like a trout's back, of the old pool.

I remember coming here first over thirty years ago, jungle all 'round the pool, murky brown and icy the mountain spring water where we bathed, you in a black suit and white cap -

Vera, we were young then; boys nearing forty now, frisked 'round us, heard Homer far-eyed on the hill, sang Bach among oaks and hemlocks, played ball among the apples, rode horses with us in the horse show ring and around Bass Lake, climbed Flattop, Saddle and lookout tower, drank from the spring below the Saddle; Grandfather Mountain we clambered over, ladders, Nose, Attic Window, and roasted wienies on the Linville Peak.

Part 2

Ruddy copper oak leaf's heraldic flame in the deep gentian sky - a lemon yellow butterfly breezes erratically 'er gracious hydrangeas nodding and bowing deeply rose now -
